The present invention relates to a hand-operated impact device. The impact device of this invention is one that is intended for carrying out a wide variety of impact related tasks such as knocking on doors or windows, breaking glass or breaking a window into a car for access. Several patents have been issued in this area for various versions of a vehicle mounted impact device. These prior art devices all have certain deficiencies. Firstly, some of these devices are designed to be used in only a single direction. The impact devices of this invention allow the user to control the force applied to the impact device from the opposite side of the door or window. The device of this invention may be used to break glass without damaging the structure that holds the glass in place. Secondly, the impact devices of this invention are small and portable. They may be taken inside of a house or a vehicle and used to break windows or other windows. They may be used in a pedestrian area such as a parking lot to break windows of cars to get into a vehicle. They may also be used to break windows or other windows into a vehicle to remove valuables that are kept in the vehicle. All of these use cases are novel and there is no device that has a design with the potential of meeting all of these needs. A further benefit of the impact device of this invention is that it can be operated in a fashion similar to a conventional power impact hammer so that even children can be taught how to operate an impact device and to use it. The impact device of this invention allows the user to break a window in a vehicle without damaging the window or the vehicle. The impact device of this invention does not have a release trigger mechanism but instead uses a projectile that may be a round or a rock. In this application the impact device is used to break a window into a car or a house to access a vehicle or a room. The impact device of this invention has a body for holding a projectile such as a rock or a round. The impact device also has a spring-loaded impact member for striking the projectile. The impact device also has an impact 82157476af
